And so we want our third panel, the picture of a blind man groping his way literally, as we are groping our way intellectually and spiritually, crying for the great gift of perception, and cheered by the neverfading inscription beneath, Christ shall give thee light. This light of moral perception! That is what the world lacks to-day. It is colour-blind to moral beauty. And yet there is nothing more wonderful in our receiving this divine gift than in blind Bartimaeus receiving his sight and perceiving the literal beauties of nature. Only, normally perception comes gradually, and not suddenly. The thought in the original is that of the dawn slowly creeping over the hills, and gradually bringing the light and sunshine which are death to all that is dark and dreadful. It is the figure of the morning light which dawns upon us spiritually, it may be at an early Eucharist, or a silent meditation, or in a dozen different ways. O for this gift of moral and spiritual perception! It seems so impossible for us to get it just now when we seem to have got the deluge without either ark or dove--and yet it is as possible to-day as it ever has been, if only like Leonardo da Vinci we are smitten with the love of the impossible. So the old anonymous message is caught up into the current of the centuries, and reaches us to-day. The night,...
